

I think the moral of the fable of the hedgehog and the fox is to not overexaggerate about you and what you have done. The fox says that it has "77 wits" while the hedgehog only has 3. It applies to the world I live in because when you say that you are that much better, people will expect you to do that much better. It applies to me in how if I was the hedgehog, I would probably be really annoyed with the fox, but I would still try to save it. Also, I think the story should go on a bit longer and have the hedgehog die or something because it didn't have the fox's help. (I didn't sign up for english class, I didn't think I would have to write things, who is this guy putting words in my mouth, etc)
